He Talks of the Theatres.

A rugged faced old man, quite unpretentions as to dress and equally so as to actions and language, sat with legs crossed and head bowed, contemplating the glowing fire in a big baseburner in the Mercury office yesterday afternoon. There were deep lines to his face and a grizz'y frost cropped out from beneath a black slouch hat, which, like its wearer, bore signs of having passed the prime of life. A brown flannel shirt gave still further evidence of the simple tastes of the quiet man and there was nothing to in-dicate the warrior spirit in him. Some people might have mistaken him for a farmer of means sufficient to warrant him in sitting around stoves in newspaper offices. Those people would have been mistaken. The el derly man was one with more of a history than comes to many men; a man whose general-hip of a handful of adherents worried even the great Grant in times of war. He was Col. John Singleton Mosby.

The cyclopedias and historics call Mosby a mail. He didn't look like it vesterday.

guerilla. He didn't look like it yesterday, out then nebody spoke about war or such to him then. For that is a subject which is distuteful to the ex-soldier-u forbid-den topic. To avoid discussion of the past with newspaper interviewers he teers clear of botel registers and clearer is now counsel for a California railroad and it was in that State that he met John T. Bell, who suggested to him that when he visit Omaha he call at the Mercury office and se the people there.

"I suppose you find Omaha grown very World Herald reporter who had been invited

"Well, this is the first time I ever was in he town, so I don't know how to answer that," replied the colonel. "It's a very pleasant little city—so much of it as I have seen. I have't looked about much. I'm just waiting over for my train. The weather here iso't like our San Francisco

"I see," he continued, "that Jefferson and Florence were here awhite ago. Is that old e Jefferson?"

"We'l, do you know I've been told time and again that we were counterparts in appearance? On a railroad train not long ago a lady was looking over one of the magazines—the one in which Jefferson's autobiography appeared-when she came across his portrait. She looked at it a moment and then at me and finally called my attention to the fact that my portrait, Mr. Jefferson's, was in her book. How old is he?

"I'm 56. I'd like to see him again and see just how much is truth and how much s imagination. There's another attraction I care more for though. I've just missed Patti four or five times. I wonder if this last is really a farewell tour? I want to see her before she quits singing.

Theatricals seem to be the forte of the republican ex confederate. For an hour or more he recited reminiscences of theatrical experiences and talked of the plays of the present and those of the earlier days as of a

Mr. Bell and Colonel Mosby did their fighting on different sides of the fence, but they are great friends now that all is over. The old fighter left last night for his home in the west. He has been on a visit to the east .- Omaha Herald.

A VILLAIN KILLED .- Particulars of the kill og of William Lindsay, of Gaston couny, N. C., by George M. Collier, a young man, have been received. The killing seems to have been justifiable. It appears that Lindsay, who was a man of very little character, went to a neighbor's residence and grossly insulted the lady of the house. The lady picked up a big stick and ran bim out of the house. The scoundrel then went one at home but Mrs. Collier he offered the screamed for help and some one ran off for her husband. Before Collier reached home, however, Lindsay had left and gone. Col-lier got his pistol and went off to look for Lindsay and found him sitting on a barrel in a store in the neighborhood. Without any parleying Colfier pulled cut his pistol and shot Lindsay twice in the breast before he could rise from the barrel. Before the third shot was fired Lindsay got up, ex-claiming, 'Oh, my God,' and started out, when Collier shot him twice more and he fell. Collier then went close up to him and shot the last shot he had into his body.
